

Mandatory copy protection of a device for displaying a broadcast goes contrary to court findings about time and space shifting of television shows. The broadcasters shouldn't even be asking for this. On top of both of those considerations, such a copy control mechanism would not be difficult to circumvent, and in fact would be perfectly legal to. The Digital Millennium copyright act specifically allows the circumvention of copy protection mechanisms for purposes of compatibility. The arguments of broadcasters are the same arguments they made when BetaMAX came out originally. Please do not force copy protection on this media.
